More particularly, the present invention relates to an improved stethoscope having a bladder incorporated therein which cooperates with an annular spring, both being contained within a hollow chestpiece for dampening the vibrations and noises which are otherwise caused by the free transmission of air. A stethoscope is a stethoscope which has gained wide acceptance over the years. This instrument consists of a chestpiece, tubing, a pair of bellows and a diaphragm. Auscultation is used to diagnose medical conditions by listening to sounds produced in the chest of a patient and by observing the chest for indications of cardiac irregularities. In using a stethoscope, the diaphragm of the stethoscope is placed upon the surface of the chest, i.e., the chestpiece is placed upon the patient's skin, and the patient is asked to breathe normally. A second person, e.g., a physician, then listens to the sound produced by the respiratory activity and watches for indications of cardiac irregularities. The chestpiece of a stethoscope is the portion of the stethoscope which is placed upon the patient. In a stethoscope, the diaphragm and the chestpiece are usually made of plastic. The stethoscope also includes an annular spring which is mounted at the distal end of the chest
